Intersectionality: gender and income inequalities

Article
Kabeer N. «Gender, poverty, and inequality: a brief history of feminist contributions in the field of international development»

Vertical and horizontal inequalities

- ‘Vertical inequalities’ rank individuals/households by their place in the income/wealth hierarchy
  - attention to class-based inequalities
- ‘horizontal inequalities’ refer to inequalities between socially defined groups that often cut across income groups
  - address discrimination based on marginalised social identities, such as gender, race, and caste

- For a very long time, development policies focused on economic growth and the eradication of absolute poverty

What’s poverty?

Absolute versus relative poverty

- Absolute poverty is defined as a state in which a person cannot meet their most basic needs, such as food, clothing, and shelter.

- Relative poverty refers to a situation in which a person's income falls below a certain percentage of the national median income

The poverty line (threshold)

- The poverty line is an estimated, imaginary line developed by economists in order to define a poor person.
- Using certain standard measures, the poverty line is calculated such that all poor people lie below the poverty line and any one above the poverty line is not poor.
- The poverty line was 1.90 $, it 2020 it was updated to 2.15 $
- This means that anyone living on less than $2.15 a day is considered to be living in extreme poverty.
- About 648 million people globally were in this situation in 2019.

Outlook

- The recent crises have pushed the world further off track from the global goal of ending extreme poverty by 2030.
- Given current trends, 574 million people—nearly 7 percent of the world's population—will still be living on less than $2.15 a day in 2030.
- And the challenge is made harder by the fact that extreme poverty is concentrated in parts of the world where it will be hardest to eradicate: in Sub-Saharan Africa, in conflict-affected areas, and in rural areas.

Intersectionality approach

- Consider gender inequality when facing poverty issues
  - Global but also local aspects
  - Private & public domains

- War, conflicts and economic crises also trigger further vulnerabilities
  - Women are more exposed than men to violence
  - Men risk leaving the household (soldiers, migration) and female headed household are more exposed to poverty risks, esecially when children are very young

Gender and migration

Global flow of female migration

- Care drain phenomenon
- “just as poor countries suffer a brain drain as trained personnel move from the South to the North, so too they suffer a care drain” (Hochschild: 2013, p. 147)
- Feminization of migration
  - Migration flows characterized by women leaving their countries for economic reasons
  - Often first-migrant
  - Work in the care sector (domestic workers)
  - Remittances, Reconjuction
  - Case of Italy

Gendering migration policies

- Council of Europe (CoE) Resolution 2440: Gender mainstreaming of migration policies

- Invite EU MS to adopt gender statistics
- Balanced gender representation in policy making, also with intersectionality approach (inclusion of migrant background participants
- foster the financial inclusion of migrants by providing gender-responsive programmes

GM migration policies: premises

- migration is a gendered phenomenon since gender norms and expectations, power relations and unequal rights shape the migration choices and experiences of women and girls, as they do for men and boys.
- Failure to take into account gender-related considerations can expose people on the move to certain vulnerabilities, exacerbate inequalities and may render inappropriate the measures taken and services provided for their needs
- ..
- The Parliamentary Assembly stresses that migrant women and men experience intersectional discrimination based on multiple factors, including age, (dis)ability, social origin, ethnicity, religion, migration status and, of course, sex, gender identity and sexual orientation.

Implementation of GM

5. The implementation of gender mainstreaming in migration policies requires the full integration of a gender equality perspective into all legislation, policies, programmes and infrastructure that regulate migration and cater for the needs of migrant people. It is also necessary to address the violence, inequalities and discrimination experienced by migrants, including asylum seekers and refugees, in particular when such phenomena are gender-based and intersectional. To this end, the Assembly calls on member States to:

5.1 ensure that gender-based violence is recognised as a form of persecution within the meaning of Article 1 A.(2) of the 1951 United Nations Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees and the Council of Europe Istanbul Convention;

5.2 ensure that single-sex accommodation facilities are available for migrants, but that mixed gender facilities are also permitted, in particular to enable families to remain together and where this facilitates family reunion;

5.3 pay special attention to the need to provide young boys, especially adolescents, with separate accommodation facilities from those for young girls, but also from those for adult men;

5.4 in accordance with Objective 3 of the United Nations Global Compact for Safe, Orderly and Regular Migration, provide migrants, refugees and asylum seekers, during their displacement, application processes, settlement, resettlement and integration, as well as during return procedures, with accessible, accurate, timely, gender-responsive information, available in relevant languages, on the policies, regulations and services available in the host country, covering topics such as protection against gender-based violence and discrimination, and access to justice, the labour market, education, health and housing, as well as to asylum and migration procedures and services;

5.5 provide legal assistance and interpretation services by trained staff for women and girls seeking asylum or residency, with full respect for human rights and due consideration for the gender-sensitive needs of migrant women (namely provision of female interpreters where appropriate, psychological support, information on rights, etc.);

5.6 recognising that women and girls are the most at-risk and vulnerable group among migrants, with a range of different needs, provide specific protection for unaccompanied girls, single mothers, pregnant women, women with young children and women experiencing intersectional discrimination in particular;

5.7 facilitate access to gender-specific healthcare services, including sexual and reproductive health and hygiene services, education for migrant and asylum-seeking women and girls and obstetrical and prenatal and postnatal services (including breast-feeding facilities), as well as sexual health and hygiene education and services for men and boys, ensuring respect for privacy and confidentiality, and reform legislation and policies that deny or limit access to health services on the basis of residence or migration status. As far as possible, health services should be mainstreamed nationally;

5.8 ensure that feminine hygiene products are supplied to reception centres for migrants and asylum-seeking women and girls, and ensure adequate assistance in using them;

5.9 take into consideration the family situation and the possibility of family reunification to guarantee a better life for migrants and the right to family life;

5.10 ensure that migrant women and girls arriving in Europe, including through family reunification, obtain personal documentation of long-term validity within a short time;

5.11 develop a common system to recognise migrants' qualifications, skills and diplomas and adopt gender-sensitive employment policies and support frameworks;

5.12 take measures to regulate and improve the working conditions of migrants to eliminate intersectional forms of exploitation and discrimination;

5.13 take into account the fact that a higher proportion of women than men are in informal employment, such as care and domestic work, and ensure that the rights of migrant women in this type of employment are ensured through adequate supervision and accessible assistance;

5.14 take a gender-sensitive approach to policies dealing with the protection, education and integration of migrant, refugee and asylum-seeking children, in order to take into account the heightened vulnerabilities of girls, notably in relation to gender-based violence and trafficking, particularly for sexual exploitation and sexual abuse.
